There are several varieties of raisins. Among the most popular varieties of raisins manufactured and sold in the market are currant, green, and those that are added to food. The sort of grape from which raisins are formed is what distinguishes one type of raisin from another. As we previously stated, all varieties of raisins are manufactured from grapes, but the sort of fruit that goes into making each variety varies.

Similar to raisins, currants are made from red, black, or Shahani grapes and contain a lot of seeds and sugar. The kernels of this black, extremely nutritious raisin are bigger and fleshier than those of other raisins. Additionally, its qualities go beyond those of raisins and green grapes.

In the meanwhile, many grape varieties are used to make raisins. For instance, green grapes are used to make sultana raisins and green raisins. They are smaller, without seeds, and have a more palatable sweetness. Lentil rice pilaf with raisins is one of the many recipes that can be made using several types of pilaf raisins, which are made from red and black grapes without seeds.
